About Quebec

by Barbara Armbruster

Illness has made a mockery of your fine-boned face.
You pee in my presence, needing my help with the faded shapeless gown and the tangled lines that trail
down your chest
like ropes of pearls.

I remember country club dances, shimmying little Black Dresses up our silky hips to squat in discrete silence, smoking in the girls' room, patting the lacquered layers of our hair, tingling with cocktails and compliments.

You never fail to tell the joke about Quebec when my mock-French confounded all the waiters.

You seem to disremember parts about the train-trip when I stared out the window, my teary face a mirror of the rain.

We start to plan another trip-Alaska.
Like any storyteller, I choose my words with care and some of what I say is truthful and some the way I'm wanting it to be.
